

Will Canada reach its Kyoto targets?

Then-environment minister John Baird says Canada will not attempt to reach its Kyoto targets because it could not possibly reach them. An environmental lobby group sues the Canadian government for ignoring its Kyoto targets, which were legally binding. The lawsuit was dismissed in October of that year.

Is Canada facing radical and irresponsible choices under Kyoto?

Mr Kent said that "while our government has taken action since 2006 to make real reductions in greenhouse gas emissions, under Kyoto Canada is facing radical and irresponsible choices if we are to avoid punishing, multibillion-dollar payments".

Is Canada failing to achieve its Kyoto goals?

To Matthew Bramley, a climate change specialist with the pro-Kyoto Pembina Institute, it all points to either failure on Canada's part to reach its Kyoto goals, or an enormous hit for federal taxpayers as the government buys up international emission credits to meet its obligation.

Why is the Conservative government against Kyoto?

The Conservative government has spoken out against Kyoto since taking office in 2006, accusing the previous Liberal government of doing nothing to implement the treaty's provisions. The rapid growth of the Alberta oil sands industry, among others, has also made it more difficult to reach the targets.

Did we make a mistake under Kyoto?

Our most grave, and perhaps most foreseeable, mistake was fooling ourselves into thinking we could do our part under Kyoto without inflicting pain on so-called large final emitters.

Is Canada a good place to be a CEO?

Ruling Canada: Corporate Cohesion and Democracy. Halifax: Fernwood Publishing. The Canadian business community has taken the most active interest in politics at the CEO level than any other business community in the world (Tom D'Acquino, CEO of the Canadian Council of Chief Executives cited in Brownlee 2005: 9 Newman 1998:159-160).
