

Do storage units need a lock?

And while storage units might be a great solution for reducing clutter in the home, they require a good lock to ensure those belongings stay secure. Though many storage unit facilities require tenants to use a cylinder lock that the company provides, some leave it up to their tenants to provide their own lock.

Do storage units need a padlock or disc lock?

Storage units located in areas with higher crime or that have doors that are accessible from the outside are more susceptible to thieves and therefore require a padlock or disc lock that can provide a higher level of security. Shrouded or Exposed Shackle Padlocks and disc locks come in both shrouded and exposed shackle varieties.

Do you need a cylinder lock for a storage unit?

Though many storage unit facilities require tenants to use a cylinder lock that the company provides, some leave it up to their tenants to provide their own lock. If you have your own backyard unit, you also want a secure lock handy. Finding the right padlock for the job is not an easy task.

Is a disc lock a padlock?

Disc Locks Disc locks, sometimes called round locks, are similar to padlocks, only they have a disc shape with a curved shackle instead of a square shape with a U-shaped shackle. Since most of the shackle is covered by the lock body, a disc lock for storage unit security is more difficult to pry apart or cut with bolt cutters than a padlock.
