They are though still heavily owned by family run stores. Every town in the country has plenty of these. They range size from little windows in the wall to stores that can almost rival the supermarket chains. Unlike the supermarkets these stores did not begin their lives as large businesses selling a huge range of items.

I bought Prada sunglasses, 212 VIP, tequila 1800, many different beers (including brands from Paraguay, Argentina and Chile) and a couple Nike deodorants, all for a bit over US$300, definitely worth it. For items like sunglasses, ask for a discount. The store is clean and organized, and the staff is helpful. I do recommend this one.

In Paraguay it is estimated that 70% of food establishments are traditional channels, that means small neighborhood stores where they sell a little of everything. But the reality is that as the country grows, supermarkets are becoming more common, grouped into chains that bring together a certain number of stores.
