Why are solar panels so expensive in China?

In China, the world's top solar product maker, producers are already raising prices to protect margins, leading to slower orders. According to three solar panel makers in China polled by Reuters, prices for panels are up 20-40% in the past year, following the surge in costs for polysilicon, the raw material for solar cells and panels.

Are interest rates up for solar stocks?

Interest rates are up, and that's bad news for solar stocks. Tech stocks haven't been the only market segment to be hammered in the last six months. Solar energy stocks have also gotten crushed despite a sharp rise in oil and natural gas prices around the world.

Why have solar energy stocks gotten crushed?

Solar energy stocks have also gotten crushed despite a sharp rise in oil and natural gas prices around the world. The reason for the sell-off in solar stocks actually makes some sense at this point, though. Interest rates are rising, and the global economy may be slowing, which may be enough to hurt solar energy stocks long term.

Why are solar stocks down?

The chart below shows why solar stocks are down. Solar projects are built with high up-front costs and generate revenue over the course of decades, so rising interest rates will have a negative impact on project values. That cascades down to installers, manufacturers, and component suppliers. SPWR data by YCharts.
